MALBEC

ARGENTINO

On 17 April 1853, Michel Aimé Pouget brought Malbec vines to Mendoza from Bordeaux, with the view to starting the Quinta Normal de Agricultura (Agriculture School) in Mendoza. The rest is history, as they say.

It would be an understatement to say that Malbec has been a tremendous success in the last few years, bringing Argentina kicking and screaming into the UK market, out performing all other countries in terms of growth and firmly establishing Malbec into the wine canon.

There are those who have asked, 'what is after Malbec for Argentina?' Our answer is this: 'Malbec, and more Malbec'

With a regional focus, we invite you to taste and experience our Malbecs through the identity of old, new, high, low, south, north, east and west.

Diversity is our strength, and is the future for discovering ever more about this wonderful grape variety.

The Beautiful South

Neuquén and Río Negro 250 - 450m

Patagonia, with its vast open landscapes and never - ending skies, is the last calling when travelling down the Andes. Or if you prefer, it's first when starting in this remote region of Argentina.

Latitude is the cooling influence, negating any need for high altitude. Winds are strong, and the climate wild and unpredictable.

With less intensity from the light, our position allows for longer sunshine hours. The Río Negro dominates viticulture, being in the middle of an immense stretch of desert. A beautiful oasis of green, with pears, apples and cherry trees sharing water with vineyards in plots known as 'chacras'.

This river straddles 2 provinces in northern Patagonia. Neuquén, perhaps the newest vineyard region in the world, is home to a handful of larger, more commercial wineries making modern wines with great purity and definition. The Río Negro province is home to a number of smaller, boutique wineries plying their trade from old vines. At one time, this was a major wine producing region, but the dominance of Mendoza contributed to its decline in the 1970's. However, the move towards cooler climates and a renewed energy from younger winemakers is seeing a remarkable comeback to a region that produces wines of great elegance and poise.

Mendoza Remixed

Mendoza Blends 750 - 1700m

Whilst there is a big movement towards single region, and indeed single vineyard wines, the tradition of blending grapes and wines from across different regions is a long one.

This makes sense. The cooler regions provide aromatics, intensity and acidity to Malbec, whilst the warmer regions give softness and opulence to the blend.

Mendoza itself is an IG, and is used often to indicate wines of this style. The vast majority of more commercial Malbec we see on the shelves and in restaurants are made in this way. Given that Mendoza is such a large place, most producers will either own vineyards or buy fruit from established growers. Or both.

Blending from regions provides an insurance policy against the vagaries of vintage variation, and so helps to bring an unparalleled level of consistency to wines that most surely has contributed to the value vs price perception that has gained Argentina so many fans worldwide.

Bottled History

The Primera Zona

Luján de Cuyo and Maipú 760 - 1100m

For those of us old enough to remember the first malbecs to enter the market (around 1994 onwards), the majority of these wines came from this region.

Luján de Cuyo and Maipú are protected from the 'pre - cordillera', a small mountain range that separates this region from the colossal peaks of the 'cordillera frontal', those huge snow covered sculptures seemingly floating in the sky.

This region is relatively warm. Luján de Cuyo was the first region to get its own IG in the early 1980s, and is home to most of the now famous names, which dominate the industry in Mendoza.

Many sub - regions exist here too. Agrelo, the largest, Perdriel, with its rocky limestone soils, Vistalba in the West, Las Compuertas, old and opulent fruit, Ugarteche, just to name a few.

Maipú is to the east of Luján de Cuyo, and so is warmer still. Old vines exist in abundance here too. Lunlunta, Mayor Drummond and Carrodilla straddle the border of both Luján and Maipú. Famous sub regions such as Barrancas, Villa Seca, Rusell, Cruz de Piedra and Medrano share the Río Mendoza with Luján de Cuyo.

These regions are under intense pressure from urbanisation, but there are enough wineries with a sense of patronage and history.

Home of the classic Malbec style. Rich, silky and melodious.

The Birth of Cool Climate

Tunuyán and San Carlos 1050 - 1250m

Whilst general consensus says that the Uco Valley, to the south of the Primera Zona, is new, it is actually an old area of cultivation in Mendoza.

A vine pull scheme in the 1970s put paid to many hectares of old vines, but some still exist to the south of the valley. Two rivers divide 3 main regions. The Río Las Tunas and the Tunuyán River. To the north of the valley, we are home to the highest vineyards in Mendoza, Tupungato, in which we have the highest vineyards in the Valley. The next table will deal with these.

To the south of Tupungato, we find ourselves in Tunuyán. The sub - region of Los Chacayés and San Pablo, which have just gained their own separate IGs, are projected to be two of the great new regions, whilst Vista Flores, Campo de los Andes and Los Arboles gain ground.

The south of the Uco valley is known as San Carlos, and is home to La Consulta, which still has some old vines, and the IG of Paraje Altamira, whose limits rely solely on soil profile, such is the importance of their calcium carbonates.

Expect tense, nervous wines with marked texture and aromatics.

Balcony To The Stars

Tupungato and Perdernal 1250 - 2000m

Tupungato means just what it says above, balcony to the stars. Anyone who has spent a night or two up here will attest to the extraordinary clarity of the night sky.

It is high and cool here. There are numerous sub - regions, the most famous of which is Gualtallary. As yet to receive its own IG, Gualtallary is a big region, and may indeed be subject to its own, even more specific districts in the future. At present many wines label this region Tupungato Alto, since the name cannot as yet be used. Watch this space.

The wine makers of Mendoza are racing to this spot, as it is fast becoming the go - to place for high quality viticulture. Yields are low, due to the stress the plant undergoes at this altitude, and the soils are very diverse, as are the temperatures. From east to west we pass through over 700m of altitude, and at their coolest, similar to Burgundy. But with more sun. Sun intensity and UVB radiation is high, forcing the grapes to produce thicker skins, which in turn have more colour. Note the blue hues from this region.

Expect intense colour, high acidity, fluid black fruits and a rich texture, big complexity and freshness.

Perdernal, a new high altitude region in the province of San Juan, is a truly unique spot. So called because of its flinty soils, with spots of calcium carbonates, and high altitude, we will see more wines coming from here, as many wineries in San Juan and Mendoza are investing in this beautiful region.

They give a touch of cordite and fireworks to fresh, pure, mineral and lean malbecs.

Pushing the limits

Salta, Catamarca and Tucumán 1750 - 3111m The Calchaquí Valley

Home to the highest vineyards in the world, the northern valleys of the Calchaquí seem like they belong to another world, such is their ethereal beauty. One has to wonder what possessed those early pioneers to plant vines here. But here they are.

The limits don't only belong to altitude. We are on the verge of the Tropics, and any further north would mean we lose the seasonality that vines rely on for a healthy cycle. The seasons meld into each other in a more gradual way here. Some vines grow in the province of Jujuy, near the border of Bolivia, but conditions are tough.

And tough is how vines like it. Soils are deep and sandy, with frequent deposits of calcium carbonates. Despite the intensity of UVB here, conditions are cool, but you must remember to wear sun screen, as the vines do with the production of tannin and colour. No other place exists like this in the world, and like the place, these wines will knock your block off.

Expect power, intensity, richness and opulence in abundance.

In Search Of Purity

The rise of organic, biodynamic and natural wines

Much of the wine you will taste today is organic. Most of it is not certified. Until recently there has been little incentive or desire to label and certify Argentina's wines as organic. It is just a way of growing that has been taken for granted for a long time.

Biodynamic too. It takes time, money and planning, as everything the land needs has to come from the property itself.

But there is a strong movement in Biodynamic viticulture which is slowly taking hold with many newcomers and young winemakers in Argentina. It is a lot easier to start this method of viticulture from scratch. Converting existing vineyards to both organic and biodynamic presents huge challenges, even in a terroir that lends itself more easily to viticulture more in harmony with nature. Little disease is allowed to flourish in a desert. It's too dry.

By 2017, 161 vineyards and 57 wineries were awarded organic certification, the first winery being in 1995. Argentina is the world's second largest exporter of organic food. So the pace is gathering as demand grows, with over 6000H of hectares now being organically farmed.
